Alternatively, the way forward for the alternative Right under & after Trump.

I've spent about 10 years in the political sphere now, though this started in my early teenage years so I don't consider all of that time to actually be useful or reflective of my more developed frontal lobe. Regardless, I did get the privilege to deeply observe the political & international dynamics of the world. This is a rarer trait as a child, but I'm glad I got a head start on things & could formulate my worldview earlier than most. It also gave me ample time to both observe the successes & failures of movements around me, as well as research other ways similar goals have been achieved historically.

I witnessed the entire lifecycle of Richard Spencer's AltRight, and saw the height & demise of Atomwaffen Division from the inside. More importantly, I watched how the fragments of these movements continued on & left their mark on the overall RW. It's pretty funny watching talking points from several years ago enter mainstream discourse, only knowing where they originated because I watched it in real time. It really gets one thinking about how universal cause & effect is, and also justifies the thinkers of the European New Right's "metapolitics". It seems that what's usually called something along the lines of "paradigm shifts" or "vibe shifts" are very real & far more effective than many more direct approaches.

I won't pretend I've never gotten defensive about my beliefs, and even more so my way of achieving them. That's always been the real source of vitriol & infighting among the Right, the methods of achieving our goals. Metapolitics, protesting, voting, education, agitation, armed insurrection, the list goes on & on. Beyond any ideological differences between the AltRight & IronMarch, the biggest point of contention was always that they thought we were too violent & we thought they were wasting their time carrying around poster boards. Something endemic to the RW is failure to cooperate, and failure to understand the bigger picture.

This doesn't mean I think that Mitt Romney & the local NatSocs have much in common, but there is a lot more to go off of than with Bernie Sanders. When we start talking about groups like Patriot Front & AWD, or BAPists & other cliques, that line becomes a lot more blurry. Fundamentally, most of these groups want the same things & should have no issue mutually supporting each other for the time being. There's some deep divisions between Christian or Nietzschean camps, as well as others, that are entirely irreconcilable but still have the same short term tactical objectives. It's obviously not sustainable long term, but that's an issue for afterwards. For the time being, you are Athens & I am Sparta. The broader Left are the Persians.

There is a limit to this, of course. Individuals like Nick Fuentes & his ilk have proven both useless & oftentimes subversive. This isn't just limited to his countersignaling of Trump in the past few months, it's a recurring issue with taking swings at other RW cliques from actual White Nationalists to BAP's camp. Nick has dug himself into a hole with nothing left but Latinx TradCaths & OrthoBros, and they can go down with him. I should also point out that groups like that will probably continue to pop up, a non-White RW clique. AF is essentially the RW for Hispanics, which is why they're so big on "Castizo Futurism" & Asiatic women. It shouldn't be much of a task to recognize friend from foe, a lot of people need to recognize they're in better company among many normie conservatives than some on the hard Right.

Regardless, Trump's victory in the election & fairly decent cabinet picks (could've been better, but whatever) has put us in a much better position than we were before. Federal agencies are guided by policy. AWD & The Base were able to grow fairly easily under Trump before because a Red government sees Antifa as the biggest threats. When Biden took over, they brought the boot down hard on RW groups instead. This took down the Oath Keepers, 3%ers, The Base, & several other minor groups. Although we often like to ascribe ideology & malicious intent to the glowie boys, the truth is they're mostly normies following the policies they're given. Every now & then a true believer makes it through, but it's rare. It's also just as common for one of "our guys" to make it in, especially in RW coded organizations like ICE & Border Patrol. The same applies to the military.

Take note that none of this means these organizations are allies, simply that they have their attention focused elsewhere for the time being.

The Trump admin is going to be far less concerned with any RW extremism compared to the alternative. With things like DEI becoming rapidly more unpopular & being axed by many corporations, it opens up a gap in the enemy's defenses. This all allows us to start our own "Long March Through the Institutions."

The Long March was a Leftist idea from the late 60's, which expanded on the concept of Entryism. Entryism is essentially the tactic of more fringe or radical elements joining the ranks of larger organizations & attempting to shift ideological positions from within. A good modern example is the "Woke" Left infiltration of the Democratic party around 2017 onwards. Despite these people being more in line with the Green Party, they found far more success in dragging the Dems further left - away from Biden & towards Bernie or Kamala. The Long March expands this idea by not only infiltrating political parties, but also key points of influence within the government, academia, etc.

For some reason or another, going to college has become poor form among the Right. Conservatives think it's all Libtard brainwashing, and most further to the Right have a similar mindset. This is stupid, profoundly so. Virtually any position of authority or influence is going to require a degree. The entire reason that college campuses, especially in liberal arts areas like PoliSci or philosophy, are so Left leaning is because the Right doesn't go to college & become professors themselves. The schools teach Marxism because the teachers are Marxists, there's absolutely no reason why we couldn't do the same with anyone from Evola to Nietzsche. Obviously, we can't expect much from the milquetoast conservative normies, but if you fancy yourself a higher quality individual than you should be putting yourself into potentially advantageous positioning.

This means universities, intelligence agencies, think tanks, military (SOF & Officer), upper echelons of law enforcement, local politics, higher levels of business, etc. We've already seen how much power individuals like Elon Musk & Zuckerberg have purely out of business success, and both have been hugely successful at pushing the boundaries of their respective political aims. Imagine if Elon was actually an AltRighter to some extent rather than a fairly mainstream conservative. Imagine that sort of money and influence being pushed around to allied think tanks, researchers, campaigns, militias, etc.

Above all, this puts us in a far better position during the decline. If (when) the US finally hits a tipping point of balkanization, civil war, whatever, it's not going to be anyone else grabbing power than those who already have a decent amount. It's going to be the people who were already military officers, politicians, business leaders, or otherwise have the resources & reputation necessary to take a leading role. This goes for any level from the most local to international. We have the dual purpose of influencing the System from within (either subversively or constructively) & gaining a foothold for future conflicts.

As I said, there's several routes to do this from. Some are necessarily public facing, some will require some hardcore liblarping, others will just require you to hold your tongue a bit. There's something to fill your niche or talents. This also isn't limited to active roles, putting yourself in the ranks of scientists & other professionals also helps. It gives legitimacy to our views, particularly ones like race realism that are basically just denied out of ideological bias.

Getting allied individuals into the realm of 'experts' is arguably the greatest form of metapolitics, these people are generally trusted far more than obvious ideologues.

Unless it's in support of a long term goal, you shouldn't be working in the trades or any other menial labor. It generally doesn't pay great & doesn't get you anywhere. Society may collapse without plumbers & carpenters, political movements will not. Leave these jobs for the foot soldiers/electorate/useful idiots of our mission. Certain jobs may be an exception, like gunsmithing or civil engineering, but it's usually a waste of time. You're a diamond in the rough, act like it. This is an advanced form of positional warfare.

Something we've (unfortunately) become keenly aware of in the past several years is that teachers basically don't get vetted at any level except Ivy League universities. There's been plenty of teachers outed as violent Leftist extremists, usually when they overstep online & get doxxed. Instead of complaining about this phenomenon, we should follow suit. Especially within fields that are of strategic importance in the information war, think history, human geography, various social studies, etc. This is probably among the best routes for the women of the movement.

This probably doesn't need to be said, but stock up. Survivalism is something that's never a bad idea, regardless of any political beliefs. Have your weapons & some surplus. If you're positioning yourself to be a leader in the future, stockpile supplies for potential subordinates as well. I will write a dedicated article regarding the specifics of individual & collective preparedness in the future, but most of the big points are basically common knowledge in a post BoogLARP era. Study small unit tactics, especially those of non-state actors & special operations units, as well.

As we garner more individuals of note, people like BAP are good examples, we can form more organized groups to better spread our ideology & such. In lieu of explaining how important organizations like think tanks are, I simply ask that you look into the history of a few notable ones & the disproportionately large impact they've had. John Birch Society, Heritage Foundation, Institute for Policy Studies, etc. The CIA, KGB, Mossad & others have routinely created (or covertly supported) organizations like these since the beginning of the Cold War. A cursory look though any of these agencies' histories will show how effective they can be at shifting public opinion & guiding policy without even a hint of real influence on the government itself.

This method also allows you to be more true to yourself, not having to liblarp as hard. Although difficult to exactly quantify, this tactic has been applied successfully with EU parties like RN & AfD. This also isn't something that needs to be very public, many think tanks work purely behind the scenes & focus their efforts on those within the political sphere rather than the masses. We've already seen how much the modern Republican party has been influenced by the old AltRight & its successors. We've also seen how much the Democratic party has been influenced by fringe Leftists that previously were only found around the Green party. It's actually much easier for Americans, because the two parties act as surrogates for the entirety of their respective wings. It's easier to shake things up within than shifting to new parties like the Euros.

That being said, the American mission is much different than the European one. Other than the UK, Whites in Europe are still the overwhelming majority in their home countries. Even the worst victims of the migrant crisis like France & Sweden are still over 70% native born. Surprisingly, the bulk of non-White populations haven't gotten citizenship & thus voting rights even after being there for several years. Americans, on the other hand, are subject to an already internal population of natural born citizens. Americans need to navigate around the issue of a potential, and likely already existing, White minority. This leaves us with the problem of either making a White minority government, which is unlikely, or separatism. As I've already laid out in previous articles, the future of the "West" as a distinct civilization is bleak to say the least. When it goes, it will take its existing governments & culture with it. This should be leveraged to support a dedicated White nationalist agenda in the post-American age, likely confined to the northern states & heartland. The alternative is the Rhodesia scenario, White exodus to Europe or Canada, which would be almost impossible with over 150,000,000 Whites in the US.

Although America & Europe share the populist anti-migrant sentiments, America has a problem of equating those migrants to their kindred already here. A Frenchman can say he wants migrants gone & know exactly what a native Frenchman is. American conservatives have to do mental gymnastics to justify the difference between a hispanic that showed up yesterday vs one that's always lived here, because there isn't one. The principal goal of anything in America is reigniting White identitarianism. Everything else, including religion & ideology, are secondary.

Which leads us to the question of supporting certain groups or movements for purely tactical reasons, regardless of whether or not we actually support them. A good example is Mormons, who are overwhelmingly White & have well above average fertility rates. This means that Mormons serve an overall purpose, and their success as a distinct group ultimately helps are own goals. This is also the basis for the far-Right supporting Trump, because his anti-government rhetoric & stance on immigration both serves our tactical goals & pushes the overtone window further Right.

To conclude, find a place where you can accumulate power, capital, &/or influence. Whether you wish to be a Jean Le Pen type figure in politics or a warlord after the decline reaches its apex, these things are necessary.

Ambition, Patience, Discipline.

Hail Victory.

OrthoXiter is literally the most consistent anti-Fuentes bloc of my timeline. We deserve better than be lumped up with the AfRicans. Otherwise pretty good article, you recent ones were very good as well.

Good article, but do you think Hispanics who've been here for centuries should be deported or are they okay?
